her by Mee, on conditions that she would marry him. She is twenty four while Mee was more than seventy. She is pretty. Mee fell desperately in love with her. He paid devoted attention and then proposed. The young woman answered that while he was well preserved and handsome he was old and, as she would make a great sacrifice in marrying him, it would be only proper if he do something that showed undoubled good faith. Mee immediately drew up the note for $20,000, to be paid on the day of the wedding. greatest fault of mineteen or twenty does not know how to choose. Character is not formed at such an early age. Summar is coming, and the summer girl and city man will meet at seashore and mountain. They will fall in love—he with his vivacity or his money. If they marry they will find that they know simply their courteship characters and have not been true to themselves. Then come disappointment, I sorrow and separation.—[Rev.]
